

Today, the Supreme Court will hear two cases about religious freedom.

Lawyers will argue about whether a woman or her boss gets to decide about her birth control.

Photography for illustrative purposes only

Who in their right mind would want a woman's boss in charge of her birth control?

Mandel Ngan/Afp/Getty Images

Oh yeah, these guys would.

These cases have enormous implications for religious liberty in the United States. Using fake arguments about religious freedom, the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops has been supporting court cases that attack a key benefit of the Affordable Care Act—the provision of no-cost birth control to Americans covered in the new insurance plans.

The Catholic bishops, far from representing Catholics, are simply trying to use the courts to impose teachings they have failed to enforce from the pulpit. The bishops would have us redefine religious liberty to allow them to impose their religious views on all Americans, Catholic or not.

What's happening to the separation of church and state?